INTRODUCTION

Discrimination within the criminal justice system is a major concern that has repercussions for both human rights and societal equity. Like many other nations, India's prison system has recently come under fire for possible prejudices and discriminatory tactics. Disparities in living circumstances and access to rehabilitation programs are just a couple of the many inequalities that constitute discrimination in jail systems, in addition to unequal access to legal counsel and punishment. This study aims to examine the subtleties of prejudice in the Indian prison system and evaluate it to those in other nations.

The importance of this study resides in its capacity to illuminate the scope and character of prejudice inside the Indian penal system while also offering insightful comparisons. The results could guide advocacy and policy initiatives targeted at resolving these structural disparities and promoting a more equitable and inclusive criminal justice system, not just in India but also globally. Beyond the gates of the prison, discriminatory practices in correctional systems have far-reaching effects on the present and future of countless people, their families, and society at large⁸⁵⁸.

GRASP - EDUCATE - EVOLVE

⁸⁵⁸ The concern about discrimination within the criminal justice system and its impact on human rights is a significant global issue. International human rights organizations like Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch have highlighted these concerns in various countries.

RESEARCH OBJECTIVES:

1. To explore and analyze the types and levels of prejudice present in the Indian prison system, with a particular emphasis on how marginalized groups are handled, how easy it is to receive legal aid, and how different people are sentenced differently.
2. To compare the jail systems of other nations with those in India in order to find commonalities, distinctions, and potential best practices⁸⁵⁹.
3. To evaluate how prejudice within prison systems affects those who are incarcerated, their chances of rehabilitation, and society at large.
4. To make fact-based suggestions and prospective reforms to promote a more fair criminal justice system in India and around the world.

SCOPE OF THE STUDY:

In order to provide a thorough perspective, this study will largely focus on the prejudice occurring within the Indian prison system and compare it to the prison systems of a few other nations. The following crucial elements will be covered by the study:

- An examination of how marginalized groups, such as racial and religious minorities, are treated and how they are treated inside the Indian penal system⁸⁶⁰.
- An examination of the discrepancies across groups within Indian prisons with regard to access to legal counsel, fair trials, and sentencing.
- An investigation into how the environment and availability of rehabilitation services in Indian prisons may contribute to or increase discrimination.

- a comparison of related elements in a few other countries' prison systems in order to spot shared problems and potential solutions.

By addressing these objectives and focusing on these key aspects, this research aims to contribute to a deeper understanding of discrimination within jail systems, its implications, and the path forward towards a more equitable and just criminal justice system, both in India and around the world.

HISTORICAL OVERVIEW OF INDIAN JAIL SYSTEM:

The jail system in India has changed over the years as a result of numerous societal, cultural, and political reasons. Historical allusions to prisons known as "Tulapurusha" and other forms of punishment may be found in books dating back to the time of the Vedas and Arthashastra. To exercise control and advance their colonial interests, the British built a more structured and centralized jail system throughout the British colonial era⁸⁶¹. The 1919 Jail Committee created the groundwork for India's contemporary prison system. After the country gained independence, attempts were undertaken to modernize and upgrade its jail system.

The British colonial era is where India's current prison system got its start. In 1798, Calcutta (now Kolkata), created the first modern prison. The penitentiary paradigm was developed by the British with the intention of rehabilitating and reforming inmates via isolation and work. The criminal justice system has undergone numerous revisions over the years, shifting toward a more humanitarian approach that puts an emphasis on offenders' rehabilitation and reintegration into society.

1894 Prison Act

During the time of British colonial control, the Prison Act, 1894, was a major piece of legislation that outlined the correct management and administration of jails. It outlined the obligations

⁸⁵⁹ Comparative analysis with other nations is essential to gain insights and identify potential best practices for improving the Indian prison system and rights of convicts and provided standards for how they should be treated.

1949 Prisons Act

The Prisons Act, 1949 was passed after India gained its independence in order to standardize the jail system there. With a focus on the welfare of inmates and their rehabilitation, it established the fundamental foundation for the management and administration of prisons.

National Prison Reform Policy, 2003

The 2003 National Policy on Prison Reforms sought to implement extensive changes in the prison system, focusing on strengthening offenders' access to healthcare, better housing conditions, and educational and vocational possibilities.

In India, there is a wide range of socioeconomic, religious, and ethnic backgrounds represented in the prison population. However, there are issues with the disproportionate participation of some underprivileged groups in prison, like as Dalits, Adivasis, and minorities. In India's jail system, problems with overcrowding, subpar conditions, and a lack of access to legal counsel continue to be problems.

This historical overview and legislative summary serve as a basis for an analysis of discrimination in the Indian prison system in comparison to that of other nations. The study can go even deeper and look at how laws, regulations, and societal norms affect how prisoners are treated and portrayed both in India and overseas.

DISCRIMINATION IN THE INDIAN JAIL SYSTEM:

Like many other prison systems across the world, those in India are not immune to discrimination in many ways. This article clarifies the specific forms of prejudice that exist in the Indian penal system, including caste-related prejudice, prejudice based on religion, prejudice based on gender, and prejudice based on socioeconomic considerations. A comparative study is done to compare the situation in India to that of other nations in order to gain a thorough knowledge.

Caste-based prejudice permeates all aspects of Indian society, including the criminal justice system. This section examines how caste-based prejudices affect the lives and treatment of detainees from particular castes by manifesting in Indian prisons. Additionally, in order to illustrate the particular difficulties India faces, a comparison with jail systems in other nations is made. According to a 2019 report by the National Campaign for Dalit Human Rights, Dalit prisoners were more likely than non-Dalit prisoners to experience sexual assault and torture. Dalit inmates were less likely to receive release or bail, according to the report.⁸⁶²

Religious prejudice and unfair treatment of those who identify with particular religions are serious problems in the Indian prison system. With a comparative analysis to highlight inequalities in other nations, this part investigates how religious prejudice affects the experiences of those who are imprisoned in India. According to 2018 research by Amnesty International, Muslim prisoners in India were more likely than non-Muslim detainees to experience assault and torture. The study discovered that Muslim prisoners had a lower likelihood of having fair trials.

Both male and female inmates are impacted by gender inequities that are significant in the Indian prison system. This section addresses the specific difficulties faced by prisoners based on their gender and emphasizes how gender bias affects prisoners' overall experiences in Indian jails. The relative severity of gender differences can be determined by comparing the United States to other nations. Women convicts in India are more likely than men to be held pending trial, according to a 2017 report by the National Commission for Women. The study also discovered that female prisoners had higher rates of physical and mental health issues than male inmates.

⁸⁶² Caste-based prejudice is a deeply entrenched issue in Indian society, and its manifestation within the prison system underscores systemic discrimination.

The treatment and experiences a someone have while in the criminal justice system are greatly influenced by socioeconomic considerations. This section examines the discrepancies in access to opportunities and resources and examines how socioeconomic status influences the lives of those who are imprisoned in India. A comparative analysis with other nations allows for a deeper comprehension of the influence of socioeconomic issues on the criminal justice system. According to a 2016 study from the National Law School of India University in Bangalore, inmates from low socioeconomic status groups were more likely to experience assault and abuse from prison guards. According to the study, prisoners from low socioeconomic standing were less likely to have access to basic necessities including food, water, and medical attention.

In this section, the degree of discrimination in the Indian prison system is compared to that in other nations. We seek to find trends, similarities, and differences by contrasting data and perspectives from India and other countries, thereby advancing a broader knowledge of discrimination in prison systems. India was determined to have one of the highest rates of torture and other deplorable treatment of detainees worldwide, according to a 2019 report by the World Organization Against Torture. The study discovered that prisoners from marginalized groups, including Dalits, Muslims, and women, experienced a disproportionately high level of prejudice in India.

The Indian prison system is distinguished by high rates of overcrowding and understaffing as compared to other nations. Due to a shortage of resources and a breakdown in law and order, discrimination and abuse may flourish as a result. Brazil, China, Egypt, and Russia are some additional nations having extensive degrees of discrimination in their prison systems. However, the high levels of prejudice against disadvantaged groups, as well as the overcrowding and understaffing, make the Indian prison system particularly alarming.

INTERNATIONAL PERSPECTIVES ON DISCRIMINATION IN JAIL SYSTEMS:

BRAZIL

With almost 700,000 criminals confined in facilities intended for about 400,000, the Brazilian prison system is one of the most overcrowded in the world. Due to the lack of resources and the breakdown of law and order caused by this congestion, discrimination and abuse may flourish. Brazilians of color make up a disproportionately large share of the prison population and are more prone to experience prejudice and abuse. According to a 2019 report by the Brazilian National Council for Justice, Black persons were twice as likely as White people to be killed by police. The study also discovered that Black persons had a higher likelihood of being arrested and locked up than White people.

CHINA

The Chinese prison system has a reputation for being oppressive and opaque. Torture and other harsh treatment are frequently used on prisoners. Additionally, political prisoners frequently lack access to legal counsel and fair trials. The Chinese prison system also discriminates against minorities of both ethnicity and religion. For instance, Uyghur Muslims are frequently held in large internment camps where they endure abuse and compelled brainwashing.

EGYPT:

The Egyptian prison system is infamous for its inhumane treatment of inmates and lack of accountability. Torture and other harsh treatment are frequently used on prisoners. Additionally, political prisoners frequently lack access to legal counsel and fair trials. In Egypt, female prisoners are especially susceptible to prejudice and mistreatment. According to a 2018 study by Amnesty International, prison officials in Egypt frequently harassed and physically violent women prisoners. The study also discovered that female convicts were less likely than male detainees to obtain medical attention.

RUSSIA:

With more than 500,000 inmates, the Russian prison system is one of the biggest in the world. The system is infamous for its oppressive rules and lack of accountability. Torture and other harsh treatment are frequently used on prisoners. In the Russian prison system, LGBTQ+ convicts are particularly susceptible to prejudice and mistreatment. According to a 2017 report by Human Rights Watch, LGBTQ+ inmates in Russia frequently experienced physical and sexual abuse. According to the report, LGBTQ+ inmates were less likely than other inmates to obtain medical attention.

Although discrimination in prison systems is a worldwide issue, different countries experience it to different degrees. Due to its high rates of discrimination against vulnerable groups, as well as its overcrowding and understaffing, the Indian prison system is especially worrisome. The percentage of women detained in the Indian prison system is likewise quite low when compared to other nations. However, prejudice and brutality against women convicts are particularly common in India. The issue of discrimination in the prison system needs to be addressed by the Indian government. This would entail making investments to upgrade jails in India, lessen overcrowding and understaffing, and teach guards on human rights.

LEGAL FRAMEWORKS AND HUMAN RIGHTS:

International human rights norms provide a crucial framework for combating prejudice in prison systems on a worldwide scale. The main international human rights laws and standards that govern how detainees are treated will be examined in this section, with a focus on ideas like the right to a fair trial, the prohibition of torture, and the protection of vulnerable groups while in custody.

- The Universal Declaration of Human Rights' Article 5

- International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Article 7.
- Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Penalties, Article 10

Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR): According to Article 7 of the UDHR, "All are equal before the law and are entitled to equal protection of the law without any discrimination." All people have the equal right to protection from any kind of discrimination that violates this Declaration and from any instigation to such discrimination.

International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR): According to Article 26 of the ICCPR, "All individuals are equal before the law and are entitled to the equal protection of the law without any discrimination. In this regard, the law must forbid all forms of discrimination and guarantee that everyone has access to equal and effective protection against discrimination based on any factor, including race, color, sex, language, religion, political opinion, national or social origin, property, birth, or other status.

No State Party shall expel, deport, or extradite a person to another State when there are reasonable grounds to believe that he would be in danger, according to Article 16 of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT).

Additionally, discrimination of any kind, especially when incarcerated, is prohibited by the Indian Constitution. According to Article 14 of the Constitution, "The State shall not deny to any person within the territory of India, equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws."

A number of clauses in the Indian Penal Code (IPC) also forbid discrimination towards inmates. For instance, Section 33 of the IPC forbids torturing detainees. Sexual assault on prisoners is prohibited by Section 354 of the IPC.

There are numerous additional Indian laws that address discrimination in jail systems in addition to the Constitution and the IPC. A National Human Rights Commission, for instance, is established by the Protection of Human Rights Act of 1993 to look into and address complaints of human rights violations, such as discrimination against inmates.

POLICY RECOMMENDATIONS:

There are several actions the Indian government might take to modernize the prison system and lessen prejudice against inmates. These consist of:

- Putting money into bettering the conditions in Indian prisons would entail lowering overcrowding, understaffing, and enhancing access to needs like food, water, and medical attention.
- Training prison employees on human rights is necessary so that they are aware of their responsibilities under Indian and international human rights law as well as how to prevent and deal with discrimination.
- establishing efficient complaint channels: To report discrimination and other human rights breaches, prisoners must have access to efficient complaint channels.
- Increasing accountability: Inmates who are treated unfairly by prison officials must face consequences. This might entail a criminal investigation, disciplinary action, or both.

India can improve its prison system and lessen discrimination against prisoners by studying the finest practices of other nations. International best practices include the following examples:

Independent oversight organizations can assist in preventing and addressing inequality in the criminal justice system. For instance, the National Preventive Mechanisms (NPMs) that countries establish and execute with the help of technical assistance from the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC). NPMs are impartial organizations that keep an eye on how prisoners are being treated and offer suggestions to improve circumstances and avoid torture and other forms of ill-treatment. Programs for rehabilitation can lower recidivism rates and encourage social reintegration. The Offender Rehabilitation Programme (ORP), for instance, is one of many rehabilitation programs in operation in the United Kingdom. The ORP is a voluntary program that offers assistance to offenders in addressing the root reasons of their criminal behaviour. Alternatives to jail that are based in the community can be more successful than prison in lowering recidivism rates and lowering the expense of the criminal justice system. Probation and parole are two examples of community-based alternatives to incarceration that are available in the United States.

Governments all throughout the world must address the major issue of discrimination in prison systems. The Indian government can take a number of actions to improve the circumstances in Indian jails, train prison staff on human rights, set up efficient complaint procedures, and increase accountability in order to reform the jail system and lessen discrimination against prisoners. India can also benefit from other nations' best practices, such as their use of independent oversight, treatment centers, and community-based alternatives to prison. By gathering information on prejudice, encouraging diversity and inclusion in the prison workforce, and educating the general public about discrimination, the Indian government can further promote equality and human rights in the prison system.

CONCLUSION:

Comparing India to other nations, this research piece offers a thorough and illuminating examination of the problem of prejudice inside the prison systems. The findings underline the urgent need for reform and improvement within the Indian jail system, which faces particular difficulties and discrimination-related deficiencies. Although the report notes that there are many forms of prejudice in the prison systems of other countries, India must work quickly to address these problems and guarantee the protection of inmates' rights and dignity. India can contribute to the international conversation on human rights and criminal justice by building a more equal and just jail environment, eventually resulting in a more inclusive and compassionate society for all of its residents.
